

Zancudo and Pavones Beaches are Beautiful and at times Dangerous! Due to powerful surf and rapids - Avoid swimming 2 hrs. before and after low tide. Ask the locals for their favorite swimming beaches. Leave your personal belongings in your hotel, only take cash that you will need for that day. Never leave passports, money and cameras in your car. Ask your hotel for local information regarding leaving your rental car parked at the beach. Police 911

Piedras Blancas National Park
 15 Min. Northwest of Golfito

Fifty-five square-mile Piedras Blancas National Park, also known as the Esquinas Rainforest, is considered a little sister. It has been called "the new hot spot for Osa" and is an alternative for nature lovers wishing to escape from the overcrowded tourist spot. Lured recently, Esquinas was the last unspoiled humid tropical forest on the Pacific coast of Costa Rica and was severely endangered by logging and hunting. Thanks to donations from organizations like "Rainforest of the Auelians" and "The Nature Conservancy," 65% of the forest has been saved from destruction and incorporated into the national park, but the rest of the area still remains in peril. More than 100 species of mammals, including jaguars, ocelots, three kinds of monkeys, and giant anteaters have been recorded, and scarlet macaws have been successfully reintroduced. The diversity of tree species is one of the highest in Central America, even surpassing Corcovado. Secluded jungle lodges and botanical gardens are scattered along the path-lined beaches or hidden deep in the rainforest. The park, which comprises the crossing link in the biological corridor around Golfo Dulce, is accessible by road from the Interamerican Highway or by boat from Golfito. For More Information About Piedras Blancas National Park - contact Esquinas Rainforest Lodge. Lodges to visit in and around the park include:
